Hi Proud,

I really enjoyed reading your article about friendship. You started with a powerful question: Have you ever wondered how people can handle their feelings if they have a tempestuous nature? That is a fantastic way to grab a reader's attention. I also loved your honest line: They always ask me if something went wrong. That makes me realized that I'm not alone. You clearly understand the value of close friends. Your conclusion, Friends like this is not easy to find, so you should cherish them for life, shows real wisdom.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (5/5)

Congratulations! You scored a 5!

- You answered all three guiding questions completely. You explained why close friends are important, described how they help you when stressed, and reflected on what you have learned from your friendships.
- Your personal stories, like your friends asking if something went wrong and comforting you with hugs, make the topic feel real and honest. The reader learns everything they need to know.
- Great work including both your own experience and general truths about friendship. This balance is exactly what a Band 5 article needs.

Communicative Achievement (5/5)

Congratulations! You scored a 5!

- Your opening rhetorical question (Have you ever wondered...) is perfect for an article. It pulls the reader in immediately.
- You use the right tone throughout: personal and warm, but still thoughtful. For example, Close friends are people that you can really trust sounds just right for a school magazine article.
- Your conclusion wraps everything up neatly. All in all, you can clearly see how important friendship is is a strong way to finish. Well done!

Organisation (5/5)

Congratulations! You scored a 5!

- Your paragraphs each have one clear main idea. The first paragraph introduces the topic, the second defines close friends, the third and fourth give personal examples, and the last concludes.
- You use linking words well: Whenever, Sometimes, All in all, so, because — these connect your ideas smoothly.
- Your sentences flow nicely from one to the next. For instance, I have about two or three close friends that I can confide in, and they will always listen to me leads naturally into They have never betrayed me, and neither have I.

Language (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Let's work on subject-verb agreement. You wrote They sometimes tells me something funny, but when the subject is "they" (plural), we don't add "s" to the verb. Write They sometimes tell me something funny. Same with He always tells me (singular) but My friends tell me (plural).
- You wrote I also advice them how to deal with it too. The word "advice" is a noun (thing), not a verb (action). The verb form is "advise". Write I also advise them how to deal with it too.
- Watch your verb forms after "makes". You wrote That makes me realized, but after "makes" we use the base verb. Write That makes me realise (or That makes me feel).
- You wrote I've been through many situation that traumatized me before. "Situation" is singular, but you are talking about more than one. Add an "s": many situations.
- You wrote Friends like this is not easy to find. The subject "friends" is plural, so the verb should be "are". Write Friends like this are not easy to find. Also, they can be more than just friends because it sometimes feels like a family — here "it" refers to "friends", which is plural. Write they sometimes feel like a family.

- Your vocabulary is strong — words like tempestuous, confide in, betrayed, and traumatized show good range. Now let's pair that vocabulary with correct grammar, and you will be at a Band 5 in no time! 😊

Your Writing

Have you ever wondered how people can handle their feelings if they have a tempestuous nature? Do they just talk to their family or stay alone? What about friends, does friendship helps us with those problems?

Close friends are people that you can really trust. Whenever you feel sad or traumatized, you will always see them standing beside you. You will also be by their side whenever they need help from you. Close friends can also mean people or a person who you can confide in, and we'll keep each other's secrets. Sometimes you might feel lonely and empty without them.

When I feel stressed, my friends always notice that by themselves. They always ask me if something went wrong. That makes me realized that I'm not alone, and that I have somebody who can listen to me. They sometimes tells me something funny, so that makes me laugh and feel better. They also comfort me by giving a hug, or tell me something that reminds me not to feel bad with it.

I have about two or three close friends that I can confide in, and they will always listen to me. They have never betrayed me, and neither have I. When I had a bad day, and need someone to be by my side, just to remind myself that I'm not alone. They will always be there for me. They sometimes tells me about their problems too, so I always listen to them. I would try to make them feel more comfortable with me, and make them feel better with their problems. I also advice them how to deal with it too, because I've been through many situation that traumatized me before.

All in all, you can clearly see how important friendship is. You don't need to be strong in front of them because you can rely on them for always. Friends like this is not easy to find, so you should cherish them for life. They can be more than just friends, because it sometimes feels like a family at school.

Sincerely,

A2+	70%	3/5	3/5	3/5	2/5

Hi Plern,

I read your article about friendship, and I can see you put a lot of personal experience into it. Your opening question really caught my attention: Have you ever wondered why some of teenagers sit alone in the bussy cafeteria while every one have friends, but they're not? That is a strong way to start! I also really liked how you shared your own story of being betrayed and then finding real friends. It made your writing feel honest and real.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You wrote about the importance of friends and your personal experience, which is good. To reach a 5, you need to develop your main points more. For example, you said friends can influence you to be good person or bad person, but you didn't explain how. Try adding one or two sentences with a specific example, like "For instance, a good friend might encourage you to study harder, while a bad friend might pressure you to skip class."
- Your final paragraph says if you don't have any close friends now later you'll have if you being nice to them. This idea is a bit general. To make it stronger, add a short sentence about what you learned from your own story, like "From my experience, being kind and patient helped me find true friends."

Communicative Achievement (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You did a good job using an article style with a question at the start and a personal story. However, your ending feels a little too quick. The phrase All in all, if you don't have any close friends now later you'll have sounds like a sudden stop. Try adding a short conclusion that wraps up your main message, like "In short, having close friends is one of the most important parts of growing up."
- You used the word laugho which is a playful, informal word. In a school article, it is better to use standard English. Change laugho to laugh or make me laugh.

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Your paragraphs are separated clearly, which is good. But your linking words are very basic: Back then, but, All in all. To improve, try adding more variety. For example, after you wrote I've met a lots kind of friends until I found my real close friend, you could add "Eventually" or "After some time" to show the passage of time more smoothly.
- Some parts jump around a little. For instance, you go from I've confuse for a day straight to They use to be reasonable to hated someone. Try adding a linking sentence like "I felt confused, and I wanted to understand why." This would help the reader follow your story.

Language (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Let's start with spelling. You wrote bussy but the correct word is busy. Also, occured should be occurred (double 'r'). And laugho should just be laugh.
- You have some trouble with subject-verb agreement. For example, you wrote every one have friends but it should be everyone has friends. Also, some of teenagers should be some teenagers (no 'of' needed). And Having friend are also important should be Having friends is also important.
- Your verb tenses are a bit mixed up. You wrote I've confuse for a day but it should be I was confused for a day (simple past, not present perfect). Also, They use to be reasonable to hated someone should be They used to be reasonable about hating someone.
- You wrote a simple sentence: I used to walk with them or doing some activity with them. To make it more interesting, try combining it: I used to walk with them or do activities together, but after the betrayal, I felt alone. This adds a compound structure and more feeling.
- One more thing: you wrote Back then when my friend group betrayed me for some impenetrable reason. The word impenetrable is too formal here. A simpler word like unknown or unclear would work better.

Your Writing

Have you ever wondered why some of teenagers sit alone in the bussy cafeteria while every one have friends, but they're not?

This question occured to me three years ago. Back then when my friend group betrayed me for some impenetrable reason.

I've confuse for a day. They use to be reasonable to hated someone.

They give a reason that I've been bossy all the time, but I just influencing them in positive ways. This friend group were very important to me because we met since grade 1. I used to walk with them or doing some activity with them, but now I've been alone.

The time went so fast, And I'm in mathayom 1. I've met a lots kind of friends until I found my real close friend for 3 people.

They're very kind honest to me, and they also understand what trauma I had. They always support me when I feel stressed by making me laugho.

All in all, if you don't have any close friends now later you'll have if you being nice to them. Having friend are also important for teenagers same as their have a perfect test score because friends can influence you to be good person or bad person ,and that's up to their personality.

Hi Preme,

You started your essay with a powerful question: Have you ever been in a situation where you met someone who acts cheerful but her eyes were full of pain? That really caught my attention. I also noticed how you described this girl: Everyone wants to be her friend to take advantage of her kindness. That is a very thoughtful observation. And your own story about being bullied and your friends who just hug me tell me it's ok shows real personal experience. Great work on choosing such meaningful examples.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (5/5)

Congratulations! You scored a 5!

- You fully answered the question about the importance of close friends. Your story about the girl who was used for her kindness, your own bullying experience, and your final lesson all work together perfectly.
- The reader gets a clear, complete picture of your ideas. Well done!

Communicative Achievement (5/5)

Congratulations! You scored a 5!

- You used the article format just right. The opening question makes the reader curious, and your personal stories keep them interested.
- Your tone is warm and honest — it feels like you are talking directly to the reader. That is exactly what a good article does.

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You have good paragraphs, but your sentences sometimes run together. For example, you wrote I feel bad for her, she has to act like everything was fine — try breaking this into two sentences: I feel bad for her. She has to act like everything was fine. Or use a connecting word like “because” or “so.”
- You used some linking words (so, but, if, that's why, one time, in conclusion), which is good. To reach Band 5, try adding more variety: however, although, as a result, for example, in addition.
- Your second paragraph is very long. Try splitting it into two paragraphs: one about the girl, and a new paragraph starting with One time, when I got bullied... This makes your essay easier to follow.

Language (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You have some trouble with plural nouns. You wrote she never felt like she has an actual friends and I hope she can find an actual friends. In English, after “an” we use a singular noun. Write an actual friend (singular) or actual friends (no “an”). Also, she had a lot of friends — that is correct.
- Your verb tenses sometimes switch in the middle of a story. For example, you wrote she has to act like everything was fine when it's not. This mixes present and past tense. Since your story is in the past, try: she had to act like everything was fine when it was not.
- Subject-verb agreement needs work. You wrote If she didn't care about what society think — “society” is third person singular, so write society thinks. Also, It would really helped her should be It would really help her (after “would” we use the base verb).
- Try making one of your simple sentences into a longer, more interesting sentence. For example, you wrote They just hug me tell me it's ok and I shouldn't think about it too much. You could combine ideas: They just hugged me and told me it was okay, which helped me stop worrying so much. This shows you can connect your thoughts smoothly.
- Your vocabulary is mostly good, but you used actual friends a few times. A more natural word here is real friends or true friends. For example: she never felt like she had any real friends.

Your Writing

Have you ever been in a situation where you met someone who acts cheerful but her eyes were full of pain?

I once met someone, she has a lot of friends but she never looked happy. Maybe because she was smart and kind. Everyone wants to be her friend to take advantage of her kindness. That's why she never looked happy because she never felt like she has an actual friends who really wants to be friends with her. I feel bad for her, she has to act like everything was fine when it's not because she was afraid to get judge/hate by society. I think it's important she has some close friends to stay by her side comforting her. If she was brave enough, it would've been better. If she didn't care about what society think and set boundaries. It would really helped her. I hope she can find an actual friends so she can rely on them, be the person to also receive not just give.

One time, when I got bullied my close friends just sat there listening to me telling them how I felt. They stay with me, never called me "sensitive". They just hug me tell me it's ok and I shouldn't think about it too much.

In conclusion, I've learnd that having close friends is important more than you think. I also learnd that someone might looked fine when they're not, so by having close friends. They could help and comfort you.

Hi Tam,

I really enjoyed reading your story about friendship and trust. You started with a thoughtful question: "Have you ever wondered why some people always change their bestfriends?" That's a great hook. I also liked how you described your new friend as "good hearted and reasonable" – those are strong, clear words. Your personal experience feels real and honest, and I can see you put a lot of thought into what you learned.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (4/5)

You're at a 4. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You asked a question about "why some people always change their bestfriends", but your story mainly talks about one friend who changed. Try adding a sentence at the start that connects more directly: "I wondered why some people always change friends. Then I learned the hard way."
- You wrote about how "a best friend that always help you solving problems" is important. The task asks you to explain how friends support each other when life is hard. You covered this a little with "push me through every hard moment". To reach Band 5, add one more specific example: "When I felt sad about the rumours, she sat with me and said, 'Don't worry, I'm here.'"
- Your conclusion says "Thank you for giving me a good lesson", but it's not totally clear who you are thanking. Make it clearer: "To the friend who hurt me, thank you for teaching me who to trust."

Communicative Achievement (4/5)

You're at a 4. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used a rhetorical question at the start and end – that's a good article technique. To make it stronger, add a short answer after your first question: "I used to wonder that too. Then I found out the hard way."
- Your story is personal and honest, which is perfect for this task. To make the register even better, add one sentence that talks directly to the reader: "You might have a friend like this too – someone who stays when things get hard."
- The ending "I will remember this happend" feels a little rushed. Finish with a stronger final thought: "I will remember this lesson forever, and I am stronger because of it."

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You divided your text into paragraphs – that's good. But your first paragraph is very long and mixes two ideas: the new student and the friend who talked behind your back. Try splitting it: Paragraph 1: the new student arrives. Paragraph 2: what happened with her. This helps the reader follow your timeline.
- You used linking words like "then", "so", and "after that". To reach Band 5, add some variety: "First, she seemed friendly. However, later I found out she wasn't." Other useful words: "although", "meanwhile", "as a result".
- Your third paragraph starts with "One month pastby". This is a good time marker. To connect it better to the previous paragraph, try: "After one month of silence, I decided to move on and find a new friend."

Language (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You have some spelling errors that are easy to fix. You wrote "Two year ages", but it should be "Two years ago". Also, "pastby" should be "passed by", and "happend" should be "happened".
- Watch your capitalisation. You wrote "She look cute" with a capital S, which is correct, but later you wrote "so i ignore it" – that "i" should be "I" (always capital I in English). Also, "Break times come" doesn't need a capital B unless it starts a sentence.
- You have some verb agreement errors. You wrote "She look cute", but because "she" is third person singular, it should be "She looks cute". Similarly, "should works" should be "should work" (after "should", we use the base verb). And "people thought can't effect" should be "people's thoughts can't affect" – add the apostrophe for possession, and use "affect" (verb) not "effect" (noun).

- You wrote “I have learn” and “I have a trust issue” — both need small fixes. The first should be “I have learned” (past participle), and the second could be stronger: “I developed a trust issue” or “I started to have trust issues”.
- Your sentences are mostly simple. Try combining two ideas into one longer sentence. For example: “She never talked behind my back. She pushed me through every hard moment.” You could write: “She never talked behind my back, and she always pushed me through every hard moment.” That makes your writing flow better. ★

Your Writing

Have you ever wondered why some people always change their bestfriends?

Two year ages, New year new student, but this year my class has only one new student, She look cute and friendly. Break times come, people starting breathing bad rumors about her being transfer here because of friends issues. I don't believe the rumor that much, so i ignore it and talked to her any way. Then after that we became... bestfriend, but little that i know she start talking behind my back when i found out, She didn't explain much and she stopped coming around me. She ending up changing her bestfriend every weeks.

One month pastby, she stopped coming around me since that happened, so I found a new bestfriend. She is good hearted and reasonable. She never talked behind my back, and push me through every hard moment, when she had her hard moment i stayed by her side too, and that is how bestfriend should works.

Have you ever wondered what people have been through in their school life and what their have learned?

In my story after i been through that one friends, I have a trust issue, I'm always thinking “what will this friend think about me?” “will they be gossiping about me?”. Then times heal I start to think less of what people will say about me. I have learn that people thought can't effect my life any longer.

All in all, It important to have a best friend that always help you solving problems, and stayed by your side in every moments. To the friend, Thank you for giving me a good lesson about choosing friends. I will remember this happend and i still manage to get through it.

Hi Aat,

I enjoyed reading your personal story about your friend and the pre-olympiad course. Your sentence "When I think about that, my mind is so clear and I feel very joyful because I have friend who can listen my problems" really shows how much that support meant to you. It was also great to see you end with a clear lesson: "having friend is extremely important because they can pull you back when you're down." You have a strong memory here, and you shared it in a way that feels real and honest.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (4/5)

You're at a 4. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Your story is clear and personal, but the first sentence "Have you ever wondered why large amount of students right now become lot of despair" is confusing. Try starting with your topic more directly, like Have you ever felt lost and needed a friend to help you? That way the reader knows right away what your article is about.
- You have strong details about the course and your feelings. To reach a Band 5, add one more specific moment. For example, after your friend said "you're not dumb," you could describe how your study habits changed: I started taking notes more slowly and asking questions when I got stuck. This makes the lesson even richer.

Communicative Achievement (4/5)

You're at a 4. Here's reach a 5.

- You used a personal story and a conclusion, which fits an article well. However, the opening sentence needs to grab the reader's attention more clearly. Instead of "Have you ever wondered why large amount of students right now become lot of despair," try a stronger hook like Have you ever felt completely lost even though you were good at something? This sets the scene for your story.
- Your conclusion works, but you can make it stronger by connecting back to your reader. After "I think having friend is extremely important," add a short question or call to action: So next time you feel alone, remember that one friend can change everything.

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You have clear paragraphs and some linking words like when, after, finally. To improve, add more variety. For example, instead of just After class, I'd call my bestfriend, you could write After class, I called my bestfriend because I needed someone to talk to. This connects the action to the reason.
- Your paragraphs are in time order, which is good. But try using a linking word at the start of your conclusion paragraph too. Instead of In conclusion, you could use Looking back or Now I understand that to make the flow smoother.
- One small fix: break your second paragraph into two. The sentence "When that course started, my mom told me to pack all of my stuff up because I had to stay there for several weeks" could start a new paragraph about the first day. This helps the reader follow the timeline.

Language (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Your capital letters are mostly correct, but check your sentences. You wrote "I'm the student who have incredible skills" – the word "I" is always capital, and you did that right here. But in "My bestfriend" you forgot a space: write my best friend as two words.
- Spelling: you wrote occured – the correct spelling is occurred (double "r"). Also pre-olympiad is fine, but check theoretical – you wrote it correctly in the story, so that's good!
- Subject-verb agreement is your biggest area to work on. You wrote large amount of students – "amount" is for things you can't count (like water). For people, use a large number of students. Also, everyone seem like they not struggle should be everyone seemed like they did not struggle (past tense, and add "did").

- Tense consistency: you switch between present and past. For example, you wrote I'm the student who have incredible skills (present) but the story is in the past. Try I was a student who had incredible skills to keep the whole story in the past tense.
- Try making one sentence more complex. You wrote "I got like top5 score and highest in theoretical section." Turn this into: I got a top 5 score, and I even earned the highest mark in the theoretical section. This adds "and" to connect two ideas smoothly.

Your Writing

Have you ever wondered why large amount of students right now become lot of despair.

This question occured to me when I was 11 years old. I'm the student who have incredible skills in Mathematics and Science. One day, I think how can I use this skill, so I had signed in for pre-olympiad course due to my curiosity. When that course started, my mom told me to pack all of my stuff up because I had to stay there for several weeks.

My first day, when I arrived everyone having their seats and friends, but I'm too afraid to talk and makes connection with stranger. Details of information is extremely enormous and very precise. I was very stressed because I couldn't figure and rearrange problems like I usually do. While I looking at the rest, everyone seem like they not struggle at all. After class, I'd call my bestfriend because my negative emotions is too intense. My friend said one thing that hold my mind back "You're not dumb, you just not calm enough, remember the one who write the exam is you everything is depend on you not others" After that, I feels so good and I started to catch the pattern and reorganize it. Finally, I got like top5 score and highest in theoretical section.

When I think about that, my mind is so clear and I feel very joyful because I have friend who can listen my problems when I'm in my weak side.

In conclusion, I think having friend is extremely important because they can pull you back when you're down. This is the best lesson that I will carry it everywhere.

Sincerely,

Your Results

 CEFR	Score	Content	C.A.	Organisation	Language
A2	60%	2/5	2/5	2/5	2/5

Hi Ploy,

You really dug into some deep ideas here. I can see you have personal experience with this topic, like when you wrote about being friend with 3 or 4 mental ill people in a past and how two of them try to find my adress. That's a powerful story, and it shows you care about the subject. I also noticed your question at the start – Why friendship is so important? Especially people with mental illness – which is a great way to get the reader thinking.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Your essay talks a lot about the negative side of friendship, like it can get toxic and Don't let them used you. For a school magazine, the task asks for more balance. Try adding one paragraph about the positive things friends do for teenagers, like making you laugh or helping you with homework. That way the reader sees both sides.
- You wrote about threatening me to harm themselves, but this personal story is too scary for a school magazine. Try replacing it with a general example, like: When a friend feels sad, you can listen to them without trying to solve everything yourself.
- The essay starts with a question about mental illness, but the task is about friendship for all teenagers. Next time, try to write more about everyday friendship, not just mental health. For example, you could say: Friends help you feel less alone when you are having a bad day.

Communicative Achievement (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used direct questions like Why friendship is so important? which is a good way to talk to the reader. But the tone changes a lot — sometimes it sounds like a conversation (Let's talk about Mental Health topic) and other times it sounds like a warning (Don't let them used you). For a magazine article, try keeping the same friendly tone all the way through. Start with: Have you ever thought about why friends matter so much?
- Your ending paragraph gets very serious: Don't pity them, and try to be okay with their behaviour just because of their mental health. This sounds like advice to an adult. For teenagers, try a softer ending: Remember, you can be there for a friend without forgetting to take care of yourself too.

Organisation (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used Firstly and Secondly to separate ideas, which is good. But your paragraphs jump between topics. For example, you go from Ice Age to favourite person to your own story. Try writing one clear idea per paragraph. For your first paragraph, keep it all about why humans need friends (the Ice Age idea). For the second paragraph, keep it all about the favourite person concept.
- You wrote Friendship is really important, Because when you really depressed you shouldn't get lonely — but this sentence is too long and mixes two ideas. Try breaking it into two: Friendship is really important. When you feel depressed, being with friends stops you from feeling lonely.

Language (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You have some good vocabulary like distract, toxic, and despair — nice work trying these words! Your main area to fix is subject-verb agreement. You wrote it sound so sweet and it can get toxic when one try to overstep. In English, we add an "s" to the verb for "it" and "one". Write it sounds so sweet and when one tries to overstep.
- You wrote Us human always go haunting by group. This sentence has a few issues. Try: We humans always went hunting in groups. Also, haunting means ghosts, while hunting means looking for food.
- You wrote Setting your line clearly. This is close! In English we say setting your boundaries clearly (boundaries = the limit of what you accept from others).
- Check your capitalisation. You wrote Even though in the middle of a sentence, and Because at the start of a new idea. In English, we only capitalise the first word of a sentence. Write: Even though it sounds sweet, it can get toxic and Friendship is really important, because when you feel depressed...

- You wrote Don't let them used you. After "let" we use the base form of the verb. Write: Don't let them use you. Also, in a past should be in the past.

Your Writing

Why friendship is so important? Especially people with mental illness. How mental problem effect friendship?

Firstly, Ever since before Ice Age. Us human always go hunting by group, and that became our instinct, it doesn't matter if you're introvert or anti-social, You still needs other living thing anyway, even if it's your pet.

Secondly, Let's talk about Mental Health topic. There is a term called "Favorite Person", Which is used for Personality disorder case, It's means "Someone who distract them from negative emotion, and help them feel more 'human' and 'worth of living,'" Even though it sound so sweet, But it can get toxic when one try to overstep one another by being their "Saviour" or only with them for the "Therapist" relationship part. The best way to make this heathy is to balance it, Setting your line clearly.

Friendship is really important, Because when you really depressed you shouldn't get lonely because it will get despair. When you with your friends it will distract you from negative emotions for a while until reality hit, but until then you can figure out how to calm it down, and feel better with, and without them.

Over all, Friendship is really important for emotion and mental health, But even how much you really loved them, Don't let them used you. Especially when you are weak. I used to be friend with 3 or 4 mental ill people in a past, and two of them try to find my adress, and threatening me to harm themselves, But it's already in the past, and i learn how to get over it. Don't pity them, and try to be okay with their behaviour just because of their mental health.

 CEFR	Score	Content	C.A.	Organisation	Language
A2	60%	2/5	2/5	2/5	2/5

Hi Mawin,

I read your essay about being alone and having no friends. You asked some thoughtful questions like "Have you ever think about that what will you do if you have no friends do everything alone." I also liked how you listed your points with "Firstly", "Secondly", and "lastly" – that shows you were trying to organise your ideas. Your idea that "staying alone yes it is not bad but if you have only just 1 best friend that is better" is a nice conclusion. You have some strong thinking in there!

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You wrote about what happens when you have "no friends", but the question asks about the importance of close friendships for teenagers. Try to focus on what you learn from a best friend, like trust or sharing secrets. For example, instead of "the problems is you have no one to help you", write "a close friend can help you with problems and give you advice."
- You mentioned "you will not understand what you don't understand from the school", but you didn't say what you learn from having a close friend. Add one sentence about a real example, like "From my closest friend, I learned how to be a better listener."
- Your essay talks a lot about bad things (stress, homework, being an introvert). For Band 5, you also need to include one good thing about friendships. For example, you could write "A close friend can also make you feel happy and less lonely."

Communicative Achievement (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Your essay starts with a question, but it does not have a clear introduction. Try adding one sentence at the start that tells the reader your main idea. For example, "Close friendships are very important for teenagers because they help us learn and grow."
- Your writing jumps between ideas. For example, you wrote "If you were all alone. The problems is you have no one to help you" and then later you talk about maths homework. To help the reader follow, keep each paragraph on one topic. Make your conclusion clear: "In short, having one best friend is better than having no friends at all."

Organisation (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used "Firstly", "Secondly", and "lastly", which is good! But your ideas jump around. For example, between "Firstly you will be stressed" and "Secondly you will not understand", you added a sentence about talking at school. Keep your points separate. Write: "Firstly, you will feel stressed because you have no one to talk to. Secondly, you will not understand your schoolwork."
- You wrote a long sentence: "If you do it from school you will have a bit of homework" inside your example. Break long sentences into shorter ones. For example: "If you finish your work at school, you will have less homework at home."
- Add a simple linking word between your points. For example, between "Firstly" and "Secondly", you can write "Also," or "In addition," to connect your ideas smoothly.

Language (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You are having trouble with verb forms after question words. You wrote "Have you ever think about" but after "have" we use the past participle. Write "Have you ever thought about" instead. Also, you wrote "what will it happens" but after "will" we use the base verb. Write "what will it happen."
- Your spelling of "advise" needs a small fix. You wrote "give an advice" and "ask for advise". The noun is "advice" (no 's' needed) and the verb is "advise" (with an 's'). Write "ask for advice" and "give advice."
- You wrote "one people" but "people" is plural and doesn't use "one". Write "one person" if you mean a single friend, or "some people" if you mean more than one.

- You wrote a run-on sentence: "Have you ever think about that what will you do if you have no friends do everything alone." This is three ideas pushed together. Try breaking it into two sentences: "Have you ever thought about what you would do if you had no friends? Would you do everything alone?"
- To make your writing sound more advanced, try joining two simple ideas with "because" or "so". For example, you wrote "you will be stressed because when you are at school you didn't have some one to talk". You can upgrade this to: "You will feel stressed because you have no one to talk to at school, so your worries stay inside."

Your Writing

Have you ever think about that what will you do if you have no friends do everything alone.

If you were all alone. The problems is you have no one to help you ,and give an advice except your family you need to work and study hard but the good thing is you can focus what are you doing right now.

If you don't understand the things that teacher teaches you what will it happens.

You need to think and study it by your self example "You don't understand the maths problems but you have no friends to ask you so you have one more work to do at home after class that's a bad things. If you do it from school you will have a bit of homework" what have you learn about no friends no social and stay alone quite all the time

Firstly you will be stressed because when you are at school you didn't have some one to talk about what you stressed about. Secondly you will not understand what you don't understand from the school. So it will make you have more home work. lastly you don't have anyone to ask for advise and you will be an introvert.

So staying alone yes it is not bad but if you have only just 1 best friend that is better than staying alone and you can know that there is one people by your side.

Sincerely,

Your Results

 CEFR	Score	Content	C.A.	Organisation	Language
B1	80%	3/5	3/5	3/5	3/5

Hi Jomtub,

I really enjoyed reading your article about close friends. You started with a great question: Have you ever wondered why some people have lots of friend, but they still look bereft? That makes the reader curious right away. I also liked your example about the popular girl during her final exam – it shows you are thinking about real situations. And the word bereft is a strong choice, it shows you know some excellent vocabulary.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You wrote a good introduction with a rhetorical question, which is perfect for an article. But your essay is not finished – it stops in the middle of your story about the popular girl. To reach a 5, you need to complete your story and add a conclusion. For example, after describing how her close friends helped her, you could finish with: "That day, I learned that having 5 close friends is better than having 50 normal friends."
- In your opening, you wrote a student with large group of friends and he always look bereft. Later you wrote about a girl with 5 friends but then said those 3 friends were all her close friends. This is confusing – is it 3 or 5 friends? Check your details and make sure numbers match. Try: "she only had 5 friends with her, and those 5 were her close friends."
- Your essay gives one example (the girl during exams), but it is incomplete. A Band 5 essay would also explain what you learned from your own closest friendship. You could add a short sentence like: “From my own closest friend, I learned that a true friend stays with you even when things are hard.”

Communicative Achievement (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used good article features: a rhetorical question in the first line, personal stories, and your opinion. Well done! But the article feels unfinished because it has no ending. A Band 5 article always has a clear conclusion. Try adding a final paragraph that wraps up your main idea. For example: “So next time you see someone with many friends but a sad face, remember: it's not about how many friends you have, it's about how close they are.”
- Your second paragraph starts with Another story occurred last year but then cuts off. The reader is left wondering what happened. To reach a 5, make sure every anecdote is complete. Finish the story so the reader understands your point fully.

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used good linking words like when, because, compared to, and another story. These help your writing flow. Nice work! But your second paragraph is only one sentence long and incomplete. To reach a 5, every paragraph should be a full, developed idea. Try expanding your second paragraph so it has at least 3-4 sentences.
- You have a clear structure: introduction → first example (the boy) → second example (the girl). But because the second example is not finished, the organisation feels unbalanced. A Band 5 essay would have two complete examples, each with its own paragraph, plus a strong conclusion paragraph. Think of a simple plan: Paragraph 1: introduction. Paragraph 2: example 1. Paragraph 3: example 2. Paragraph 4: conclusion.

Language (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Let's look at your spelling. You wrote sitration twice, but the correct spelling is situation. Also, occured should be occurred (two 'r's). And bereft is a very good word — you spelled it correctly! ★
- You had some trouble with plural forms. You wrote lots of friend, but when you mean more than one, use the plural: lots of friends. Also, large group of friends should be a large group of friends (don't forget the small word “a”).
- Your subject-verb agreement needs some attention. You wrote he always look bereft, but in English, when the subject is “he” or “she”, the verb gets an “s”.

Write he always looks bereft. You also wrote those 3 friends were all her close friends — that is correct! So you already know how to do this, you just need to be consistent.

- You used some excellent sentences already! For example, you wrote Compared to normal friends which aren't really dependable, and they can also betray you anytime. This is a good complex sentence. To make it even stronger, try joining ideas with "because" or "although": "Although normal friends can betray you anytime, close friends are dependable and will help you no matter what." This shows the contrast more clearly. 😊

Your Writing

Have you ever wondered why some people have lots of friend, but they still look bereft? When I go to school everyday, one thing I always see is a student with large group of friends, but he always look bereft. That's mainly because he doesn't have friends that he can actually talk to, and that's his close friends. You see, close friends are friends that are very good hearted, and they are also very dependable and will help you no matter the sitration. Compared to normal friends which aren't really dependable, and they can also betray you anytime, especially when you're in a bad sitration.

Another story occured last year during the final exam, I stumbled across a popular girl that usually has a lot of friends, but this time she only had 5 friends with her. She was sobbing and was really stressed about her exam. And those 3 friends were all her close friends, her other

Hi Porsch,

I read your essay about close friends, and I really enjoyed your ideas. You asked some thoughtful questions like "Have you wonder why some friend that feel like family?" and "Do your close friends teach you or make you be better?" – these got me thinking! I also noticed you shared a personal story about your close friend stopping a fight, which made your writing feel real and honest. You clearly have strong feelings about what makes a true friend.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You wrote that "close friend can't proof with the time you spent together" – this is a strong idea, but it needs more explanation. Try adding one more sentence after this to say why time doesn't matter. For example: "It's not how long you know someone, but how they treat you when you need them."
- Your personal story about your friend stopping a fight is good, but it's a little short. Next time, add one detail: what did you learn from that moment? For example: "That day I learned that a true friend will protect you, even if it costs them something."
- You have three good questions in your essay, but they don't all connect clearly to your main point. Try linking each question directly to your answer. For example, after "Do your close friends stand by your side when you are struggle?", follow up with: "My friend did exactly that when he helped me with that fight."

Communicative Achievement (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You use rhetorical questions like "Have you wonder why some friend that feel like family?" – that's a great way to start! To make it even stronger, add a short introduction sentence before the question. For example: "We all have friends, but some friends feel like family. Have you ever wondered why that is?"
- Your essay ends a bit suddenly with "Close friends can't proof with time but proof with action." Try adding a closing sentence that wraps up your main idea. For example: "So in the end, it's not the years but the actions that make a real friend."
- The title is missing. Your essay needs a clear title that tells the reader what it's about. Try: "What Makes a Friend Feel Like Family?"

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Your paragraphs are separated, which is good. But each paragraph could have a clearer topic sentence. For example, your second paragraph starts with "I think close friend can't proof..." – try starting with: "First, true friendship is not about time." Then explain your idea.
- You use the linking word "when" a lot (five times!). Try using other connecting words to make your writing flow better. For example, try "because", "although", or "while". Instead of "when you are struggle", you could write: "because they support you during difficult times".
- Your third paragraph jumps from the fight story to finding a solution. Try adding a transition sentence between these two ideas. For example: "After my friend stopped the fight, he didn't stop there. He also helped me make peace with the other class."

Language (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You are using the word "proof" as a verb, but in English we say "prove" (without the 'f'). For example, you wrote "can't proof with the time" – change this to "can't prove with time". The same fix applies every time you write "proof" as a verb.
- You wrote "when you are struggle" – in English we say "when you are struggling" (with -ing) or "when you are in a struggle" (with 'in a'). The same issue appears in "when you in the trouble" – try "when you are in trouble" (add 'are' and remove 'the').
- You wrote "when he going to fight me" – remember to add the verb 'was': "when he was going to fight me". Also, "my close friend came and stop them" should be "my close friend came and stopped them" (past tense).

- You wrote “calme the person” – the correct spelling is “calm the person” (no ‘e’ at the end). Also, “say something that is not in a offensive way” should be “say something that is not offensive” (remove ‘in a’, and change ‘a’ to ‘an’ before ‘offensive’).
- Your sentences are mostly short and simple. To make your English sound more natural, try joining two ideas together. For example, instead of “Close friends will stay by your side when you are struggle. When you need someone to help you.”, try: “Close friends will stay by your side when you are struggling and when you need someone to help you.” This makes one smooth sentence instead of two short ones. ★

Your Writing

Have you wonder why some friend that feel like family?

I think close friend can't proof with the time you spent together, but they need to proof with how do you act to them, and what did they act to you. Close friends will stay by your side when you are struggle, when you need someone to help you or you need someone to understand you, close friends will be there.

Do your close friends stand by your side when you are struggle?

My close friends always with me when I'm in trouble with people in another class. When he going to fight me my close friend came and stop them by his fist, and my close friends find the solution to make me good with them.

Do your close friends teach you or make you be better?

My close friends teach me how to be good when someone looking for problems with me. My close friends show me how to calme the person that looking for problems with say something that is not in a offensive way to others.

So close friends will stand by your side when you are down, struggle or when you in the trouble. They will always not leaving you and make you solve the problems by your own. Close friends can't proof with time but proof with action.

 CEFR	Score	Content	C.A.	Organisation	Language
B1	80%	3/5	3/5	3/5	3/5

Hi Katie,

You start your essay with a really strong question: Have you ever walked around school and saw people walking alone looking miserable, and wondered why teenagers need friends? That hooks the reader right away! I also noticed you gave a personal touch at the end: The lesson I've learned from my best friend is that you shouldn't just give you also deserve to recieve as well. That shows you're thinking about your own experience. Your idea about friends cheering you up with a movie example is also a nice, clear point.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You wrote Jeffry Dahmer, he was well known due to his horrific actions that contain eating his victims. This example is very extreme and dark for a school magazine. It makes your essay feel less focused on the topic of friendship. Try a lighter example instead, like: If you hang around people who skip class, you might start skipping too. That still shows how friends influence us, but it fits the magazine better.
- You answered all three guiding questions, which is good! To push to a 5, give more detail for each one. For example, when you say Friends are able to cheer you up, add a specific reason why: Friends can cheer you up because they know you well and can tell when something is wrong.
- The last paragraph about setting boundries and prioritizing yourself is important, but it comes a bit suddenly. Connect it to your main idea: The lesson I learned from my best friend is that a good friendship is not just about giving – you also deserve to receive. That is why we need to set boundaries and prioritise ourselves.

Communicative Achievement (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used a rhetorical question at the start, which is perfect for a magazine article. Well done! To reach a 5, keep that tone throughout. For example, you wrote This question has been occurring for quite some time – that sounds a bit formal. Try: This is a question people have asked for a long time. It's friendlier and matches your opening.
- The Jeffrey Dahmer example is too shocking for a school magazine. It might scare readers instead of helping them think about friendship. Replace it with a more relatable example, like a story about choosing good friends at school.
- You wrote Example you're having a bad day – this is good and personal! Keep using this friendly, direct tone. Add one or two more examples like this to make your article feel like you're talking to the reader.

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Your essay has three clear paragraphs, which is good basic structure. To improve, add topic sentences that tell the reader what each paragraph is about. For paragraph 2, try: First, let's look at how friends shape who we become.
- You wrote Because of this most people advise you to choose who you are associated with. example, Jeffry Dahmer. The word "example" needs a capital letter and a colon: Example: Jeffry Dahmer. Also, this sentence is a bit jumpy. Connect it: Because of this, most people advise you to choose your friends carefully. A famous example is Jeffry Dahmer.
- Some of your sentences are very long. For instance, Most teenagers who are isolated, tend to not be able to function properly in society, due to the extreme impact and influence the people around you have to you behaviour and how you dress – this is a run-on sentence. Break it into two: Most teenagers who are isolated tend to not function well in society. This is because the people around you have a strong influence on your behaviour and how you dress.

Language (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You have several spelling errors to fix. You wrote occurring → occurring, seriel → serial, recieve → receive, and boundries → boundaries. Try reading your essay out loud to catch these next time.

- You wrote the people around you have to you behaviour — the word “to” should be on: the people around you have on your behaviour. Also, you behaviour should be your behaviour. Practice checking your possessive words (your, their, my).
- You wrote she like to go to the beach — actually, you wrote he was well known due to his horrific actions that contain eating his victims. The word “contain” should be included: that included eating his victims. When you talk about past events, use past tense verbs consistently.
- You wrote Jeffry Dahmer, didn't have any friends at all, and it was the loneliness that drove him mad. The comma after “Dahmer” is not needed here. Write: Jeffry Dahmer didn't have any friends at all, and it was the loneliness that drove him mad. Removing extra commas makes your sentences cleaner.
- Try making one of your simple sentences more complex. You wrote Friends are able to cheer you up. Add a reason: Friends are able to cheer you up because they notice when something is wrong and can invite you to do something fun, like going to the movies. This connects your ideas and sounds more mature.

Your Writing

Have you ever walked around school and saw people walking alone looking miserable, and wondered why teenagers need friends?

This question has been occurring for quite some time, and we shall be answering it in this paragraph. Most teenagers who are isolated, tend to not be able to function properly in society, due to the extreme impact and influence the people around you have to you behaviour and how you dress. Because of this most people advise you to choose who you are associated with. example, Jeffry Dahmer. The well known seriel killer, he was well known due to his horrific actions that contain eating his victims, that is the reason why having good friends have a huge impact on you. Jeffry Dahmer, didn't have any friends at all, and it was the loneliness that drove him mad.

Friends are able to cheer you up, due to the ability to tell whats wrong with you. Example you're having a bad day, your friend notices and invites you to the movies to make you forget your sorrows.

The lesson I've learned from my best friend is that you shouldn't just give you also deserve to recieve as well, learn to set boundries and prioritize yourself.

 CEFR	Score	Content	C.A.	Organisation	Language
A2+	70%	3/5	3/5	3/5	2/5

Hi Poopup,

I read your article about close friends and I can see you have really thought about what makes a close friend different from a regular friend. I love the way you opened with a question: Have you ever wondered how much would change when your closefriends are no longer friends with you? That makes the reader curious right away. Your personal story about meeting a new friend in 7th grade is a nice touch too. You have some strong ideas here, Poopup.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You wrote a good comparison between friends and close friends. For example, you said closefriends will make you feel better when you are sad, and cheer you up when you are down. This is clear and helpful. To reach a 5, add a short example of a time a close friend actually did this for you (or you did it for them). This makes your idea feel real.
- You have one sentence that might confuse the reader: Even without friends, I am pretty sure you can live your life as normal as you are now. This seems to say friends aren't needed, which goes against the rest of your article. Try changing it to something like: Even without close friends, you can still live your life, but having them makes it better.
- Your story about meeting her in 7th grade is good, but you don't say what lesson you learned from that friendship. Add one sentence at the end of your story, like: From that day, I learned that a real close friend is someone who stays even when you feel shy and new.

Communicative Achievement (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You did well by using rhetorical questions to start and end your article. That is a good convention for an article. However, your last question Have you ever wondered how can a human being lived without a friend? has a grammar issue that makes it hard to understand. To keep your reader engaged, write it as: Have you ever wondered how a human being can live without a friend?
- Your article talks about close friends in general, then you suddenly say Even without friends, I am pretty sure you can live your life. This makes the reader feel confused about your main message. To reach a 5, make sure every sentence supports your main idea that close friends are very important. Remove or rewrite the sentence that contradicts your point.

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Your paragraphs are separated, which is good. But the jump from your general thoughts about close friends to your personal story feels sudden. To make the flow smoother, add a linking sentence before your story, like: I learned this lesson from my own experience.
- You use basic linking words like but, when, and and. Try adding a few more to connect your ideas. For example, between Closefriends will make you feel better when you are sad and cheer you up when you are down, you could write: for example, closefriends will make you feel better when you are sad and cheer you up when you are down.
- Your personal story paragraph jumps from meeting her to describing her personality. Try putting the sentences in a clearer order: first say when and where you met, then describe what she looked like, then explain how she made you feel.

Language (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You sometimes forget to space words. You wrote closefriends and by her self. Next time, write close friends (two words) and by herself (one word). This small fix makes your writing look cleaner.
- Your verb tenses are mixed up in a few places. You wrote I've saw her in the corner, but after "I've" (which is short for "I have") we need the past participle. Write I saw her in the corner (simple past) or I've seen her in the corner (present perfect). Also, you wrote how can a human being lived – the correct form is how can a human being live (after “can” we use the base verb).

- You have a subject-verb agreement error. You wrote Closefriend will never let you down, but the subject is plural. Write Close friends will never let you down.
- You missed a word in one sentence. You wrote If your closefriends ever betray you when trusted them. The word “you” is missing. Write If your close friends ever betray you when you trusted them.
- You are using short, simple sentences like She is the kind of person that never let you down. To make your writing more interesting, try joining two ideas into one sentence. For example: She is the kind of person who never lets you down, and she always has your back. This uses the word “and” to connect two thoughts into one smoother sentence.

Your Writing

Have you ever wondered how much would change when your closefriends are no longer friends with you?

During a stressful moment, friends are there to help you out, but closefriends are something deeper. They don't have to be the people you spend time the most with.

Closefriends are people who you trust the most during a serious moment. Closefriends will make you feel better when you are sad, and cheer you up when you are down. Yes, friends can also do that, but not all friends stay when you are at the lowest point of your life.

Closefriend will never let you down when you need them the most. If your closefriends ever betray you when trusted them, then consider stop talking to them. Even without friends, I am pretty sure you can live your life as normal as you are now.

Have you ever wondered how can a human being lived without a friend?

I've met her in 7th grade At the time I was super new to the class and very shy because everyone here is from a different class. I've saw her in the corner of the crowded room. She was standing there by her self looks like a kid who never been to school before. She is the kind of person that never let you down and always have your back all the time.

Hi Taia,

I really enjoyed reading your essay! You start with a thoughtful question: Have you ever wondered why some people, despite being socially compatible with everyone, seem so lonely sometimes? That hooked me right away. I also loved your image of people who lurk somewhere alone, even in a room full of people – it's so true and a bit sad. And your final sentence, never take your friends for granted, and cherish them forever, is a beautiful way to wrap everything up.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (5/5)

Congratulations! You scored a 5!

- You wrote about the importance of close friends with real examples, like how your friends crack a joke to lighten the atmosphere and how your best friend taught you to rely on someone. This makes your essay rich and personal.
- Your ideas are fully developed from your own experience, and you end with a clear message for the reader. Great work!

Communicative Achievement (5/5)

- Your tone is warm and reflective, which fits the topic of friendship really well. The reader feels like they are having a chat with you.

Organisation (5/5)

Congratulations! You scored a 5!

- You used linking words like Once in a while, Usually, Most of the time, Overall, and So to connect your ideas smoothly.

- Your vocabulary is excellent. Words like lurk, confide, therapy, cherish, and isolation show strong control of English. You chose each word carefully.
- Your grammar is very accurate. You used different tenses correctly: I used to be quite lonely (past), I've gradually learned (present perfect), and we would always support each other (past habit).
- Your sentences have good variety. You use simple sentences (She taught me what having a close friend feels like) and more complex ones (It's a bit sad knowing that some people have to keep everything to themselves, because they have no one to confide in). This makes your writing flow naturally.
- There are no spelling or punctuation errors. Your writing is clean and polished.

Your Writing

Have you ever wondered why some people, despite being socially compatible with everyone, seem so lonely sometimes?

Once in a while, I see people that get along with pretty much everyone, but usually lurk somewhere alone, even in a room full of people. It kind of makes me wonder how they can cope with whatever they have going on without having to confide in someone close to them. I have a few close friends that I talk to all the time. I can trust them with anything, and they are sometimes like a form of therapy to me. I used to be quite lonely when I was younger, and not many people liked me then. Sometimes, I look back and think how I made it through life without any friends.

Usually my friend group would always support each other in many different ways. We would always give each other advice, and be there for each other, even when things get hard. Most of the time, if any one of us is in a bad mood, we would all try to crack a joke to lighten the atmosphere a little. Sometimes, your friends can help you without you knowing it, even if it's just by their presence.

I've only been friends with my best friend for about 3-4 years, but I feel like I could trust her with my life. I've gradually learned that you can rely on someone from time to time, and that you don't have to always keep things to yourself. She taught me what having a close friend feels like, and I will forever be grateful for that.

Overall, I think we all need someone to rely on sometimes, and that we don't have to live in isolation. It's a bit sad knowing that some people have to keep everything to themselves, because they have no one to confide in. A friendship is built on love, trust, and memories, and it takes time to build a good friendship. So, never take your friends for granted, and cherish them forever, because you'll never know if one day you will have to lose them.

Sincerely,

A2+	70%	3/5	3/5	3/5	2/5

Hi Fuji,

I read your article about close friends and I really like how you asked so many questions to make the reader think. Lines like "Have you ever see someone who cry because they don't have friends at school" and "how is your friends help you to solving problems" show that you care deeply about this topic. Your idea that "friends are very important to our school life" comes through clearly, and I can tell you have strong feelings about friendship. 😊

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You wrote about how friends help with problems and stress, which is great. But the question also asked about "what you have learned from your closest friendship." Try to add one sentence about a lesson you learned. For example: "From my closest friend, I learned that listening is more important than giving advice."
- You asked a lot of questions like "Have you ever see..." and "Do you think if...". Try to replace two of these questions with a short story or example from your life. This will make your ideas feel more real and personal.
- You mentioned "It will make you relationship stay long" at the end. To reach a Band 5, add one specific thing you do to keep a friendship strong, like: "I always say thank you when my friend helps me."

Communicative Achievement (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- Your opening line "Have you ever see someone who cry because they don't have friends at school" is a good try at a rhetorical question, but it is a little confusing. Start with a stronger hook: "Have you ever felt lonely at school because you had no one to talk to?" This is clearer and grabs the reader right away.
- You used rhetorical questions well in the middle, like "Have you ever think how is your friends help you to solving problems". For a Band 5, mix in one or two statements that give your opinion, not just questions. For example: "In my experience, close friends make even hard days feel easier."
- Your register (the way you talk to the reader) changes a bit. At the start you say "so if you be that how would you feel" which is very informal. Try to keep a friendly but clear tone throughout, like: "So if you were that person, how would you feel?"

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used good basic linking words like so, but, because, and and. To improve, try adding one or two more advanced connectors. For example, after "they can help you solving the problems" you could say: "As a result, you feel less stressed and more confident."
- Your paragraphs each start with a question, which makes the flow feel repetitive. Try starting one paragraph with a statement instead. For example, instead of "Have you ever think if you argue with your friends" you could write: "Arguments with friends are normal, but they can be hard to deal with."
- The sentence "When we have problems they can solving it better, so you need to make them feel good when they stay with you" changes from "we" to "you" in a confusing way. Pick one: either use "we" throughout or "you" throughout. For example: "When we have problems, our friends can help solve them better, so we need to make them feel good when they are with us."

Language (2/5)

You're at a 2. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You had trouble with capitalisation and punctuation in a few places. For example, you wrote "friends at school , so if you be" with a space before the comma. In English, we put the comma right after the word, like this: friends at school, so if you be. Also, you wrote "problems and help you do homework." but then the next sentence "Do you think" should be a new sentence. Make sure you use a full stop (.) to end one idea before starting a new one.

- Spelling was mostly okay, but I noticed “improtant” in “so It improtant to have close friends”. The correct spelling is important. Also, “argue” is spelled correctly here, but the word “relationship” in “make your relationship stay for a long time” is correct too – good job! ✓
- You need to work on verb forms after “have ever” and “how to”. For example, you wrote “Have you ever see someone” but after “have ever” we use the past participle. Write Have you ever seen someone. Also, “Have you ever think” should be Have you ever thought. Practice this pattern: have + ever + past participle.
- You also had trouble with verbs after “help” and “solve”. You wrote “they can help you solving the problems” but after “help” we usually use the base verb. Write they can help you solve the problems. And “how will you solving this stressed” should be how will you solve this stress (stress is the noun, not “stressed”).
- To make your sentences more interesting, try combining two simple ideas into one longer sentence. For example, you wrote “They will listen to your problems” and then “they will give you some advice”. You can join these: They will listen to your problems and give you some advice to solve them, which makes you feel better.

Your Writing

Have you ever see someone who cry because they don't have friends at school , so if you be that how would you feel ?

I think friends are very important to our school life because when you do some homework or problems they can help you solving the problems and help you do homework.

Do you think if you have a big problems but you don't have someone , or close friends to tell them about the problems how will you solving this stressed ?

Close friends are very important because when you have problems or argue with someone , you will not have someone to help , but if you have close friends they will help you when you feel bad or stressed , so It improtant to have close friends

Have you ever think how is your friends help you to solving problems and make you don't feel stressed ?

They will listen to your problems and they will give you some advice to solving your problems, so it make you feel better and don't get stressed.

Have you ever think if you argue with your friends, and nobody talk to you how would solving this problems? If you learn about your friendship it will make you and friends happy. when you stay with your friends, and It will make your relationship stay for a long time.

At the end, Close friends are very important to our school life. When we have problems they can solving it better, so you need to make them feel good when they stay with you. It will make you relationship stay long and happy.

Hi Krabi,

I really enjoyed reading your essay about close friendships! You started with a great question: Have you ever wonder why have a close friendship helps with your despair? That makes the reader curious right away. I also liked your personal story about your friend Tim, especially when you said he helped me relaxed and comfert. It's clear that you understand how important friends can be when we feel stressed. Your idea that friends are still there for you even when you don't have a problem is a beautiful thought.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You covered all three points from the task (why close friends matter, how they helped you, what you learned). That's great! But your second point about introduce you in new society feels a little off-topic. Try to keep every sentence focused on how friends help with despair or stress. For example, instead of that sentence, you could write: Friends can also introduce you to new hobbies that make you feel happier.
- Your personal story about Tim is strong, but it's very short. Try to add one more detail. For example, after helped me relaxed, you could say: He took me for a walk and told me to breathe slowly. This makes your example feel more real and complete.

- Your third paragraph says they help you out of that problems, but you already said something similar in the first paragraph. Try to add a new idea here, like: A close friend can also help you see a problem from a different angle.

Communicative Achievement (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used a good question to start: Have you ever wonder why have a close friendship helps with your despair? This is a nice article-style opening. To make it even better, make the grammar correct: Have you ever wondered why having a close friendship helps with despair? Your reader will then take you seriously from the first line.
- You used a personal story, which is perfect for an article. The tone is friendly and honest. To keep this tone throughout, avoid switching to a very casual phrase like and etc. at the end. Instead, finish with a strong sentence like: They can introduce you to new people and new ideas.
- Your conclusion So, I think friends do effect our lives in many ways sounds a bit like spoken English. For a written article, try: In conclusion, friends truly affect our lives in many important ways.

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used paragraphs, which is good. But your paragraphs are quite short. Try to make each paragraph have 3-4 sentences. For example, your second paragraph (about Tim) could include a sentence about how you felt before and after he helped you.
- You used basic linking words like and, because, and when. To reach Band 5, add a few more. For example, in the second paragraph, you could write: I was very stressed because of the exam, but Tim helped me relax. The word but shows a contrast and makes your writing flow better.
- Your paragraphs follow a similar pattern: idea, example, repeat. Try to vary the structure. For instance, in your third paragraph, you could start with a question: What did I learn from this friendship? I learned that sometimes friends solve problems you cannot solve alone.

Language (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You have some trouble with verb forms. For example, you wrote helped me relaxed, but after 'helped' we use the base verb. Write helped me relax. Also, you wrote who's can help, but 'who's' means 'who is'. For plural friends, use who can help.

- Your spelling of comfert and effect needs a small fix. Write comfort and affect (affect is a verb; effect is usually a noun). For example: Friends affect our lives in many ways.
- Watch your subject-verb agreement. You wrote they help you out of that problems, but 'problems' is plural. Write those problems. Also, you can't solve with by yourself has two prepositions. Write you can't solve by yourself.
- You used the word problem four times. This is a bit repetitive. Try to replace some with words like issue, difficulty, or worry. For example: When you have a difficulty, they help you out.
- To add variety to your sentences, try combining two short ideas. For example, instead of He is really comfortable to stay with, when I tell my problems, and Tim really solve that problems very well, write: He is really comfortable to talk to, and whenever I tell him my problems, he solves them calmly. This one sentence is clearer and more natural. 😊

Your Writing

Have you ever wonder why have a close friendship helps with your despair?

What do you think having friends who's can help with trauma important? Well I have a story about myself. I have a friend name Tim, and last year I got very stressed because of the exam, and helped me relaxed and comfert. He is really comfortable to stay with, when I tell my problems, and Tim really solve that problems very well.

What I can tell about having a close friendship is importantly when you have a problem or not they are still there for you. When you have a problem they help you out of that problems.

What I've learned from a friendship is sometimes they can help with problem that you can't solve with by yourself.

So, I think friends do effect our lives in many ways. They can introduce you in new society and etc.

Sincerely,

Teacher Ed

 CEFR	Score	Content	C.A.	Organisation	Language
B2	100%	5/5	4/5	3/5	4/5

Hi Elenna,

Wow, your essay really pulls me in from the first sentence! I love how you start with a question — Have you ever sat down in class on the first day of school, and you see everyone getting into groups — that's a great way to make a reader feel like you're talking directly to them. Your story about the large friend group breaking apart is so honest and vivid, especially when you describe them spilling horrible rumors and indignantly fighting back. You clearly care about this topic, and that comes through strongly.

Now let's look at how you can take what you already wrote and push each section to a Band 5.

Content (5/5)

Congratulations! You scored a 5!

- You covered every part of the task. You talked about why close friends matter, how they can support you (emotionally, mentally, physically), and you shared a personal story about friendship groups changing. That's exactly what the task asked for. ★
- Your examples are specific and real. When you wrote about the friend group separated and teamed up against each other, and was spilling horrible rumors, the reader can really picture what happened. That makes your content powerful.

Communicative Achievement (4/5)

You're at a 4. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used the right conventions for an article: a question to hook the reader, a personal anecdote, your opinion, and a conclusion. That's excellent. To reach a 5, make sure every sentence is clear for the reader. For example, you wrote I would perceive but I wouldn't want to get involved in any arguments — this is a bit unclear. Try something like I could see what was happening, but I chose not to get involved in the arguments.
- Your overall message is easy to follow, and the reader feels your voice throughout. Just check that each sentence says exactly what you mean. When you wrote your just sitting there feeling isolated, it should be you're just sitting there feeling isolated. Small fixes like this make your communication even stronger.

Organisation (3/5)

You're at a 3. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You have paragraphs, which is good. But some of your paragraphs are very short or contain incomplete sentences. For example, your third paragraph starts with raised and taught differently and inspired or influenced differently — this is a sentence fragment, not a full sentence. Turn it into a full sentence like These teenagers were raised differently, taught differently, and inspired or influenced by different things.
- You used linking words like and, but, because, then, and that is why. That's a good start. To reach a 5, add more variety. Try using words like however, therefore, in addition, or as a result to connect your ideas more smoothly.
- Your last paragraph (starting That is why, I think close friends are important) is a good conclusion, but it could be a little longer. Add one more sentence to wrap up your main idea, like In the end, having one true friend is worth more than having many people around you.

Language (4/5)

You're at a 4. Here's how to reach a 5.

- You used some impressive vocabulary like disassociate, indignantly, and demoralized. That's fantastic for this level! Keep using words like these — they make your writing sound mature and thoughtful. ✓
- Work on your spelling. You wrote eachother — in English, this is two words: each other. Also, imperceptable should be imperceptible, and alot should be a lot (two words).
- Check your verb agreement. You wrote the friend group separated and teamed up against eachother, and was spilling horrible rumors. The group is "it", so the verb should be was spilling — but actually, the whole sentence needs fixing. Try: The friend group separated, teamed up against each other, and started spilling horrible rumors.

- You also wrote storys — the plural of “story” is stories (change the “y” to “ies”). And your considered lucky should be you’re considered lucky (you’re = you are).
- Try making one of your simple sentences into a compound or complex sentence. For example, you wrote Being in a large group is fine in my opinion, but it’s hard to learn about your friends. To make it even better, try: Although being in a large group is fine in my opinion, it is hard to truly learn about your friends when there are so many of them. 😊

Your Writing

Have you ever sat down in class on the first day of school, and you see everyone getting into groups, while your just sitting there feeling isolated.

I would often see my classmates being in large friend groups on the start of the term, then by the end of the term all the large groups broke up into trios and duos. It seemed like everyone just decided to disassociate from eachother for some imperceptable reason, I would perceive but I wouldn’t want to get involved in any arguments.

Well, I used to be in a large friend group, We would tell eachother secrets, storys and very personal stuff about eachother. An argument happened, the friend group separated and teamed up against eachother, and was spilling horrible rumors and indignantly fighting back. Some people in the friend group moved, got depression or was deeply demoralized. Being in a large group is fine in my opinion, but it’s hard to learn about your friends especially when they’re alot of them in a group, and I think it’s because these teenagers come from different backgrounds, raised and taught differently and inspired or influenced differently, builds the person you are, that is why some people handle things in a family way.

That is why, I think close friends are important, especially in smaller groups you can learn enough about the person to see if you can trust them, and close friends can also be very supportive emotionally, mentally and physically.

Overall, if you have a close friend you can trust your considered lucky in this world.

Sincerely,

Teacher Ed
